Record year for North Shore rescue

INCREASE Volunteer organization looking for ways to sustain

Wanyee Li
Metro | Vancouver

North Shore Rescue has responded to a record number of calls so far this year and is looking for ways to manage the increased workload this has put on its volunteers. The search and rescue organization has responded to 95 calls in 2016 as of Wednesday, five more than the same period in 2015. Last year was already a record year for the volunteer-based NSR, said team leader Mike Danks. "It's sustainable if it continues to increase at this rate? I don't know the answer to that," he said. "What I can say is our team is going to be meeting in September and we're going to talk about the increase in call volume and things we can do to hopefully lighten the load." Hiking in B.C. is becoming increasingly popular among locals and tourists, resulting in more calls, explained Danks. "If you go out onto the local trails now, there's a lot of people out there and there's a lot of tourists out there that are very naive to the dangers in the back-country." It's paramount for people to research the trip before heading out on a hike, he said. "Our big focus is on education and prevention. We're doing as much of that as possible."

Danks said a large part of that education effort comes from Emergency Management BC (EMBC). This year, the provincial government provided $346,000 to B.C. search and rescue groups for the nationwide education program Adventure Smart in which educators meet hikers at the start of trails. The Adventure Smart funding was part of a one-time $10-million grant to the BC Search and Rescue Association, which represents the province's 80 search and rescue groups, according to a written statement from EMBC. That additional funding was a response to the increased number of calls some SAR groups in B.C. have been experiencing, according to the statement. But most of NSR's operating budget ($170,000 out of $500,000) still comes from public donations, according to Danks. EMBC is currently reviewing an alternative support model, according to a spokesperson. When asked about the idea of becoming a professional organization as opposed to a volunteer one, Danks said NSR was not actively exploring that option. "But we're open to any discussion and ideas that might be brought forward," he said. One thing NSR does not want to see for certain is a pay-for-use model where people cough up money for their own rescues. "What happens is people will try to self-rescue and in self-rescuing, they're going to delay calling us and more likely get themselves into more treacherous terrain," said Danks. "We're strongly against that."

Conservation to candidate

Politics
Bryce Casavant is now running in Comox for New Democrats

David P. Ball
 Metro | Vancouver

Last July, Bryce Casavant lost his job as a Conservation Officer for refusing to euthanize two young black bears — sparking a global outcry and outpouring of support for his act.

The army veteran and doctoral student in human-animal conflict announced this week that he's running to be nominated as B.C. New Democrats' candidate for Comox in next May's provincial election. He said his work ordeal, after he refused orders to euthanize the pair of five-month-old cubs nicknamed Athena and Jordan, deepened his understanding of what true leadership is.

"What we need in the political landscape of our province are leaders who are okay making tough decisions, understanding that all decisions come with a certain amount of risk," he told Metro in a phone interview, "and they're also willing to be held accountable."

"That's the link for me is that I am the kind of person who can take a stand ... I'm not saying I always get it right, but I definitely try hard to make accurate and informed decisions."

instated in the province's Conservation Officer service was denied, Casavant accepted a senior position in B.C.'s forests ministry and has been studying human-animal conflicts, as part of a doctoral program at Royal Roads University.

But while taking a stand for the bear cubs may have driven him into the public eye, his "real drive to run" is wanting to address the needs of senior citizens and protecting local water sources.

"I can't deny that I have a soft spot for environmental issues," he said with a laugh. "I think that's out there."

"For me, the real drive to run is seniors care and health-

When Marion Buller looks back on the Saskatchewan First Nation territory where she spent her summers growing up, some of her childhood friends are no longer there.

They are aboriginal women who went missing or were murdered, part of a tragic phenomenon in Canada that Buller is now tasked with examining as head of a national inquiry.

"The impact on me has been to understand the tremendous loss to the families, and not just the loss to the family, but the loss to the community as a whole," she said in an interview Wednesday. "When an indigenous woman is murdered or goes missing or is lost, we all lose."

Buller, British Columbia's first female First Nations judge, formally begins work Thursday as the inquiry's chief commissioner. Over two years, she and four other commissioners will explore the systemic causes of disproportionately high rates of violence against aboriginal women and girls. The commissioners have broad latitude to develop the inquiry process.

Buller said many details have not yet been decided but they will meet next week in Vancouver to set priorities and tackle the terms of reference.

But she said she hopes to create a setting for families that is comfortable and respectful, and that ultimately the recommendations produced in a 2018 report will be acted upon.

Dark matter galaxy discovered

ASTRONOMY
Canadian and colleague dub their find Dragonfly 44

David P. Ball
Metro | Vancouver

Many a discovery or idea was hatched over a pint of ale — DNA, the existence of carbon dioxide, Pet Rocks among them.

But a “beery” conversation four years ago has led two astronomers, including a Canadian observational cosmologist, to stumble upon a gigantic galaxy that’s as heavy as our own — but has almost no visible stars.

It’s named “Dragonfly 44,” and University of Toronto’s Roberto Abraham estimates it is made of 99.99 per cent dark matter, a mysterious cosmic material only observable through its gravitational effects.

Dragonfly 44 galaxy was spotted in the Coma constellation using Dragonfly Telephoto Array, invented by U of T’s Roberto Abraham and Yale’s Pieter van Dokkum. COURTESY PIETER VAN DOKKUM

“This is a really massive galaxy, about same mass as our Milky Way, but it’s almost pure dark matter,” Abraham, who completed an astronomy degree at the University of B.C., told Metro in a phone interview. “Dragonfly 44 is a different type of galaxy. “You could think of almost like a cloud that’s enormous but hardly has any stars in it. Such things shouldn’t really exist.”

Scientists have known about dark matter since the 1970s, he explained, but despite many “wildly speculative” theories amongst scholars no one knows what it actually is yet.

Even our own Milky Way is believed to contain some dark matter at its core. But Dragonfly 44 is the largest

“We thought, ‘Hang on, there’s nowhere near enough stars for this thing to have all this mass coming from them.’”

Roberto Alexander, observational cosmologist galaxy ever discovered made up that’s mostly dark matter, he said.

“Galaxies like this should not be found, and they shouldn’t last,” he said. “Think of it as just seeing the frosting on the cake but not seeing the cake.”

As for the name “Dragonfly 44,” Abraham explained that it’s because he and his colleague, Yale astronomer Pieter van Dokkum, found it using the Dragonfly Telephoto Array — a telescope they invented using 48 commercial Canon telephoto lenses joined together, which they hoped to use to study how galaxies form.

“We came up with the idea of using lenses for a telescope over a beery conversation about four years ago,” he said. “It’s an idea that went out of fashion a century ago, but is a pretty novel concept that’s enabling us to go after objects that are otherwise undetectable.”

“This (discovery) emerged more or less by accident ... We thought, ‘Hang on, there’s nowhere near enough stars for this thing to have all this mass coming from them.’”

After spotting Dragonfly 44, they were able to take a closer look at Hawaii’s Keck Observatory, using the powerful Gemini North telescope. The pair’s findings were published in the September edition of The Astrophysical Journal Letters.

SEXUAL EXPLOITATION

Gaps put kids at risk

There are "serious gaps" — in resources, training and research — in efforts to protect young people from online sexual exploitation, warns a study prepared for the federal government.

It means "much more still needs to be done" to ensure the safety of vulnerable children, especially in regions that lack the people and programming to make a difference, says the examination of 60 public-sector and non-profit agencies across the country.

The study, completed in March for Public Safety Canada by an Ottawa consulting firm.

Public Safety commissioned the research to build on its work against online exploitation and "ensure that federal investments are targeted at the areas of greatest need," the study said.

It followed an internal department memo in February that warned of insufficient police resources to keep pace with the burgeoning threat to children from online sexual predators.

Free-trade talks hit snag

China has been urging Canada to begin with negotiations

Formal free-trade talks between Canada and China have yet to proceed because of snags over labour, the environment and concerns linked to Chinese state-owned enterprises, says Ottawa's envoy to Beijing.

Ambassador Guy Saint-Jacques highlighted those sticking points Wednesday after Chinese Premier Li Keqiang said Canada and China would soon launch a feasibility study on an eventual free trade deal.

Li spoke to reporters through a translator after meeting with Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Asked about the remarks, Saint-Jacques denied that the two sides had agreed to begin formal negotiations.

But Saint-Jacques, who accompanied Trudeau at meetings Wednesday with Li and later with President Xi Jinping, did share some details of the prime minister's position on the matter.

"The prime minister said that the approach that Canada takes when it comes to a free trade agreement is that it must include a number of important items — he mentioned two political and two economic issues," Saint-Jacques said.

On the political side, he said it was important for Trudeau that modern free trade deals include chapters on labour and on the environment.

Saint-Jacques said the prime minister also made it clear that any deal with China must "address the impact of state-owned enterprises" and procurement.

"And as you know, those areas are problematic," he said.

"I would say that a lot more work needs to be done on those areas. I would say the prime minister was quite clear on this."

Takeovers of Canadian firms by Chinese state-owned enterprises have proved highly controversial in the past. The concerns led the former Conservative government to restrict state-owned Chinese investment in Alberta's oil sands.

For its part, China has been urging Canada to negotiate a free trade agreement.

While Trudeau has said he hopes to broaden trade with the growing superpower, he has been cautious about stating he would like pursue formal talks.

A senior Canadian official said Wednesday that some technical discussions related to free trade with China have been held and will continue, but the official stressed that there have been no negotiations.

Still, Trudeau said Wednesday that the two sides will take steps to improve trade and investment, boost tourism, expand cultural exchanges and address climate change.

The countries, he noted, also agreed to establish annual meetings between the Chinese premier and the Canadian prime minister on a range of issues, including national security and the rule of law.

"This year marks 45 years of diplomatic relations between Canada and China," Trudeau said as he stood beside Li overlooking Tiananmen Square.

Opposition slams Liberals over GDP fall

The Opposition Conservatives and the NDP seized on Wednesday's news of grim second-quarter economic growth as evidence that the Liberal government's election promises of jobs and prosperity are falling well short of expectations.

The economy recorded its worst performance in seven years during the quarter, Statistics Canada said Wednesday.

Real gross domestic product fell at an annualized rate of 1.6 per cent in the quarter, largely because of the huge wildfires that levelled parts of Fort Mc

Murray, Alta.

It's bad news for a government that campaigned on growing the economy with deficit spending and boosting the middle class. That prescription isn't working, the Tories say.

"This is the biggest drop in GDP since the end of the Great Recession," said Phil McColeman, Conservative deputy finance critic. "The Liberal government promised Canadians that if it borrowed tens of billions of dollars, it could grow the economy and create jobs. In reality, the Liberals have failed to deliver results for middle-class families, who instead are left with higher taxes, fewer job opportunities and a shrinking economy."

NDP finance critic Guy Caron said he is worried that people most in need will suffer from the economic slump, and suggested the government look at increased access to employment insurance.

"Bad news for growth and jobs are adding up and the government should react with swift actions rather than standing on the sidelines," Caron said.

Randy Hoback, the Conservative vice-chair of the Commonsense international trade committee, complained that Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is on a state visit to China that seems more style than substance.

"On a day where we learn that the economy is performing worse than it has since the Great Recession, this Liberal government is more interested in photo ops than Canadian jobs and the middle class," Hoback said in a statement.

ROSEMARY WESTWOOD
In Vancouver

In harm-reduction circles they say every overdose is preventable. By that standard, B.C. is failing dramatically.

Speak to those at the front lines of the unprecedented drug overdoses hitting Vancouver and, if they've been around long enough, the 1990s will come up.

It was a decade of headline-grabbing OD deaths, peaking in 1998 when 417 people in B.C. died from illicit-drug overdoses.

But 2016 is shaping up to be far, far worse.

Already, at least 371 people have died in the province, a two-day rate that could translate into 800 deaths by year's end. The provincial health officer declared an emergency in April.

The highest-profile culprit is fentanyl, a viciously toxic synthetic opioid detected in 60 per cent of OD deaths this year and 86 per cent of drugs at Insite, Vancouver's safe-injection site. It's spreading across the country at an alarming pace.

"2015 was the first year the number, the rate, was above 1998," noted Dr. Jane Buxton, an epidemiologist and head of harm reduction for the B.C. Centre for Disease Control.

"I'm either so angry or so heartbroken," Ann Livingston, a longtime activist with the Vancouver Area Network of Drug Users (VANADU), told me. "I think, Oh my God. We went through this in the '90s, and we lobbed like hell, and we got Insite, so there was some sense of moving forward. And now there seems to be even less action."

It's a sentiment that might surprise anyone aware of the growing headlines on opioid overdoses across this country over the last two years, from Alberta's 270 fentanyl-related deaths in 2015, to a recent national investigation by the Globe and Mail, to this week's statement from Ontario police chiefs and community safety groups calling 2016 a record-breaking year for overdose alerts and warning that fentanyl is a "ticking time bomb."

In response, both B.C. and Alberta have struck overdose task forces, and Manitoba has a fentanyl-awareness task force. The federal government has made naloxone — a lifesaving anti-overdose drug — available without prescription nationally.

The move is part of Health Canada's "Action on Opioid Misuse" plan, and yesterday, to mark International Overdose Day, the ministry announced it was "moving forward" with a plan to restrict six chemicals used to make fentanyl, citing RCMP reports of "an increase in domestic production" of the drug, which is also made in China and shipped into Canada.

But all this is not enough for Livingston. It's common parlance in harm-reduction circles that every overdose is preventable. By that standard, she says, B.C. is failing dramatically.

In her eyes, the explosion of fentanyl and related deaths is a symptom of ineffective drug, homelessness and policing policies. She cites insufficient or ineffective recovery programs; a clamp-down on opioid prescribing that drives these with addictions to street drugs; and lower-welfare support for the homeless, which she argues leads greater numbers of drug users into jails, and thus raises their risk of post-release overdose.

And she blames the dearth of legal, publicly accessible safe-injection sites like Vancouver's Insite, still the only such facility in North America — a legacy of the Harper government, which fought the site all the way to a loss at the Supreme Court, and then legislated emergency rules that have curtailed efforts to duplicate Insite, and its undisputed public-health success, elsewhere.

Judging by the Liberal government's messaging, that could change. A year ago, on a campaign stop in Vancouver, Justin Trudeau told a crowd, "I certainly want to see more safe-injection sites opened around the country." In March, his health minister, Jane Philpott, told the CBC, "Sites like Insite in Vancouver and others like them have the possibility to save countless lives."

But possibility and reality are miles apart. And possibility is where many proposed sites — in Victoria, in Toronto, and five more in Vancouver — remain. While Canadians continue to die at alarming rates, the Liberal government has given no indication that undoing the Conservative legislation is a priority.

It is hard to view that as anything other than heel-dragging. "You know what will speed this up, I think?" Livingston told me.

"Parents of kids who've died need to sue, right away. I tell ya, I would. Because it's part of this awful stigma. If you're a drug addict, you're supposed to be so ashamed of yourself that your life doesn't matter."

B.C. is already calling the fentanyl crisis what it is — a public-health emergency — and Ottawa needs to follow suit. Why should death by overdose entail any less federal action than death by poisoned water, for instance?

"We shouldn't have to wait," Livingston said, "while they fiddle and fiddle and argue, or whatever the hell they're doing, while our kids die."

E-sports: Where women don't have to be scrubs

Samantha Emann
Metro Toronto

The next big thing in arts and entertainment is competitive video-gaming. You might not realize it yet, but you soon will.

The biggest tournaments in "e-sports" — competitions involving games like League of Legends, Starcraft 2 and Counter Strike: Global Offensive (CS:GO) — drew audiences comparable to those of major mainstream sporting events. By 2019, according to market research, it will be a billion-dollar business, which is what the NHL was in about 1998.

Count on it: E-sports is going to be making people rich and famous. Women make up about half of non-pro gamers in North America, and women gamers have none of the physical disadvantages that have kept them out of traditional pro sports. Competitive gaming should be the first big-time sport in which men and women share equally in the glory and spoils.

But, right now, sponsors, advertisers and other stakeholders in the esports business are not looking at women as a viable demographic, either as players or consumers.

A woman in e-sports is "a small fish in a very large pond — a fish in a shark tank," said Laure Guilbert, a former manager for Team YP, which has teams competing in games like Street Fighter and League of Legends. She says the business side of the esports community needs to play catchup.

"There are not a lot of sponsors that are putting forward women as professional gamers," she said. Stephanie Harvey is a Canadian and a five-time world champion in the popular team shooter CS:GO. She cofounded of Missclicks, an advocacy organization for women in esports and geek culture.

While all players face some taunting, she said, the abuse directed at women is different in that it's often about looks and sexuality, rather than skill and gameplay.

"Women are targeted even if there is no reason for them to be targeted," Harvey said. "For a man, he needs to have done something (in game) to be targeted. For women, just me being there."

This industry has already broken barriers. It wasn't long ago that gamers were assumed to be white, male, heterosexual slackers who were socially inept and lived on a diet of Doritos and Mountain Dew. Now gaming's celebrities are more diverse. As an avid gamer myself, I have so much respect for people like the proud geeks of Missclicks, who show that women, who have always had a part to play in the gaming community, will continue to fight for their rightful share of this industry's rewards.

We were there in the Dorito Dark Ages and we'll be there in the E-Sports Night in Canada future.

In defense of the city critters

ADVICE
Most city 'pests' are actually fairly benign

Mark Cullen
For Torstar News Service

You may hate me for saying this — but let me say it: Bring on the critters.

If you're fortunate enough to find yourself in Invermere, B.C., any time soon, you will notice every tree on the main street has a wire cage around it.

These have been installed at great expense to taxpayers in an attempt to prevent damage by deer. It is difficult to have a garden in Invermere, since the local deer have developed a palate for just about every living thing with leaves.

Even deer-resistant plants — look for a list of them on my website, markcullen.com/search-the-library/ — are pretty much useless in Invermere.

Squirrels have this in common with deer, I find. When they are finished eating everything in sight that comes naturally to them, they start chowing down and destroying many plants that are not normally on their menu.

"Why is a red squirrel ripping the bark off my mature sugar maple?" one reader asked. My answer: "I have no idea."

To get the answer, you would have to get inside the brain of a squirrel and I am just not interested enough in the subject to become a full-time neuro-scientist of squirrels.

I say, "Garden calm and carry on." I do not have deer or rabbits in my garden. I hear horror stories about them when I travel, from the densely populated urban centres of the country to the small towns and rural areas.

While on a speaking engagement in Muskoka recently, I took questions from the audience. The enquiries about deer damage quickly became a theme of the evening.

Everyone with a deer problem, there is a special meeting afterwards. We will sit in a circle and have a deer therapy session, I suggested.

I got a laugh but we did not meet afterwards and there were

Mark Cullen argues that critters with a pesky rep are most a nuisance when we pay too much attention to them. SHUTTERSTOCK no definitive answers to this dilemma. This column is not for deer victims. It is for the more urban set that wakes up to raccoon scat on the patio or skunk smells where they were grubbing for grubs in the lawn. I know your frustration with rodents as many of them are dumped at the end of our driveway at our property north of the city.

You want raccoons, skunks and squirrels? We have them in spades. Many are "city rodents." We can tell because they don't behave with their natural intellect.

'Why is a red squirrel ripping the bark off my mature sugar maple?' one reader asked. My answer: 'I have no idea.'

instead, the raccoons wander around in the daytime looking for shelter and squirrels get chased around by their more local, native cousins.

They look lost because they are. But they do precious little damage. For the most part, they seem to be a nuisance when we pay too much attention to them.

IT'S ALL IN THE STARS Your daily horoscope by Francis Drake

Aries March 21 - April 20
Things might be dicey when dealing with bosses at work today...

Cancer June 22 - July 23
Avoid arguments with others, especially with siblings, relatives and neighbors...

Libra Sept. 24 - Oct. 23
It seems others just get in your way today, no matter what you do...

Capricorn Dec. 22 - Jan. 20
Authority figures related to politics, religion or the government might be challenging...

Taurus April 21 - May 21
Parents will have to be patient with kids today. (Sometimes it's all a bit much.)

Leo July 24 - Aug. 23
Financial squabbles are likely today. Don't go up against others, especially if they have authority or power...

Scorpio Oct. 24 - Nov. 22
Group plans or an interaction with a friend will be stymied today, possibly because of financial limitations...

Aquarius Jan. 21 - Feb. 19
You have to pay your dues and carry your fair share when it comes to group activities...

Gemini May 22 - June 21
Someone in a position of authority might block your wishes today, especially regarding family issues...

Virgo Aug. 24 - Sept. 23
Today is somewhat restrictive and possibly even depressing. This is why you want to break free from your rut but feel you cannot...

Sagittarius Nov. 23 - Dec. 21
You cannot escape the duties and responsibilities that others demand of you today, even though you don't want to deliver...

Pisces Feb. 20 - March 20
Relations with parents and bosses are dicey today, because they will interfere with what you want to do...
